Racine Art Museum Presents
Jewelry by Artists with Mexican Heritage

Racine, WI October 17, 2016

Not afraid to use jewelry to share stories or reflect emotion, many contemporary art jewelers create work that is thought provoking and engaging. Even when not being worn, their pieces can reflect the personal, social, and cultural. Open October 16, 2016 – February 5, 2017, Made in Mexico: Contemporary Jewelers with Mexican Heritage features the work of three artists who use non-precious materials to explore their heritage. In addition to investigating ideas and issues that have personal meaning, Lorena Angulo, Jorge Manilla, and Georgina Treviño create works that speak to the influence of collective histories and shared experiences.

Each artist deftly combines their responses to greater cultural concerns and influences with their personal interests in tradition, emotion, memory, and the urban landscape. Angulo has adopted an iconography that responds to Mexican folk and artistic traditions. The artist combines traditional symbols—such as hearts, crosses, skulls, flowers, and images of the Virgin Mary—with her personal experiences living and traveling in many parts of Mexico as well as the United States.

Manilla and Treviño explore aesthetics that are more streamlined and abstracted. Manilla creates work that reflects his interest in human psychology and emotion as abstract and metaphysical concepts. Believing that black is positive—in that it can represent an end which also implies a beginning—he frequently uses it as the color in his work to encourage viewers (and wearers) to speculate about “the secret and the unknown” in the universe. Alluding to religious iconography, both Catholic and indigenous, Manilla utilizes a host of experimental techniques in combination with more traditional materials like wood, bone, and silver.

Responding to the cultural and social codes of class and wealth that can distinguish urban spaces, Treviño uses nontraditional materials—such as cement and rope in her jewelry—as an echo of the primary materials used to build homes in her childhood hometown of Tijuana, Mexico. Treviño casts cement—sometimes with textures—then adds other materials and paint in order to create geometric shapes that loosely suggest the hard walls of buildings significant in her experiences.

The diversity of materials represented by these artists corresponds to the innovation of contemporary art jewelry worldwide. Whether they have a metalsmithing background or not, many of those creating art jewelry freely utilize whatever medium best suits their working style, has specific meaning for them, and/or enhances their artistic vision.
