Exploring Paper and Plastic as Adornment

Racine, WI  February 25, 2016

Frequent visitors to Racine Art Museum often see contemporary jewelry made of a wide variety of media. Open through June 5, 2016, Paper/Plastic: Contemporary Adornment reflects a variety of approaches to using nontraditional materials. Truly, jewelry can be made of almost any material—whatever a person would want to use for adornment, they could. Some materials may be more valuable, durable, or wearable than others, but if the intent is present, most things can be manipulated to be worn.

In the world of art jewelry, this notion was given renewed attention in the latter half of the twentieth century when many artists adopted non-precious materials—such as plastic, paper, fabric, and found objects—for use in their work. While mass-produced modern costume and fashion jewelry made with cheaper materials has become popular, the one-of-a-kind, expensive jewelry prominent in Western cultures is still associated with status and display. Interested in investigating new roles for jewelry and challenging some assumptions, artists found ways to incorporate paper and plastic—as well as other materials—into their practice as they subverted ideas of preciousness and suggested new meanings for adornment.

Paper/Plastic features a variety of examples to using these materials, from the Eugene Pijanowski's necklace made of Japanese paper cord (mizuhiki) to the plastic 3D printed ring by Arthur Hash. While all of these makers follow their own courses and interests, they also all seem to be in sympathy with Caroline Broadhead's statement about her own work: “My work is mainly driven by ideas but making and materials are an integral part of the process. You can’t make things without considering the craft of it.”
Other artists from RAM’s collection who are represented in Paper/Plastic include – Nuala Jamison, Bussi Buhs, Robert W. Ebendorf, Adam Paxon, Martin Adams, Hiroko Sato, Wendy Ramshaw, and David Watkins.
